Rod Usage and Safety Tips. After using your rod in saltwater, be certain to thoroughly rinse it with freshwater. Pay special attention to the guide frames, and any other metal parts. Use of a corrosion inhibitor is recommended on the guide feet. Salt tends to corrode guide frames, especially where the frame rests on the rod blank! Never use a graphite fishing rod in an electrical storm. "Graphite" rod blanks actually consist of carbon fibers, which are excellent conductors of electricity!

If your bait or lure becomes snagged, point the rod directly at the snag and pull straight back. This will put stress on the line, rather than the rod. By following this procedure, you'll either free your lure from the snag, or break your line, no rod is meant to be used as a lever to disengage entangled lures. Never use the rod as a lever to pull on a snag. If your line and knot is in good condition, then your rod will break before the line when it is bent at too severe an angle while attempting to free your lure from a snag! Avoid "high sticking" your rod when fighting or landing fish. Graphite rods will break when they are bent in arcs that are tighter than they were designed to be bent. Do not place your hand on the rod blank above the handle while fighting or landing fish. This will put excessive pressure at the single point where your hand is placed, rather than allowing the rod to distribute the pressure exerted from a fish over the entire length of the rod blank.

Do not exceed the recommended line rating for your rod. Doing so can cause excessive stress to your rod, and will void your rod's warranty. Take great care when transporting your rod. Use a protective rod case, whenever possible. Nicks, dings and scratches will greatly reduce the rods strength!
